Audience Measurement Tools

Use of anonymised data

For marketing research purposes, we may purchase or collect anonymised, aggregated data sets related to the performance of our external advertising media (e.g. billboards, streets, roads, highways, transportation, etc.) or anonymised, aggregated transactions and purchase histories from data providers. We do this on behalf of our advertisers to better understand the different types of people who will see the products we advertise. We do not seek to analyse personal data on an individual basis.

SDK and Beacon Data

From time to time, we collaborate with data partners who use data obtained from SDKs in applications, GPS data, or other data obtained from the IP address of a mobile device (if the user has consented to the sharing of such data). The provision of this data allows us to provide insight into the behaviour of the public on a large scale.

Cellular signal and SDK data

Where users provide consent, mobile phone networks may provide information based on anonymous, aggregated data from triangulated cellular signals from phones using their network. This information provides us with information about audience behaviour at the collective level in the vicinity of our advertising locations.

"SDK, or Software Development Kit, means "software development kit". It is a piece of code embedded in an application that allows that application to collect geolocation and other statistical data. When a user installs these applications on their device, they have the option to provide consent to allow the collection of limited elements of their data, including personal data, to improve the use of these applications and to share it with the application provider's business partners. Users can revoke their consent to data sharing at any time in the application settings.

Clear Channel receives anonymous, aggregated data sets from carefully selected, GDPR-compliant data partners that help us and our data partners better understand consumer demographics and real-world engagement.

Geofencing (including mobile retargeting)

Geofencing is a location-based service in which an application or other software uses GPS, RFID, Wi-Fi or cellular data to trigger a pre-programmed action when a mobile device or RFID tag enters or leaves a virtual boundary established around a geographic location, known as a geofence.

Beacons are installed on Clear Channel advertising devices at a number of our sites. These sensors passively transmit a location signal within the "geofence" that can be detected by mobile devices. If you have enabled your mobile device to connect to beacons, either through an application or your device settings, then your mobile device may attempt to connect to the beacon installed on those billboards and share its geographic information with those beacons when you enter the beacon's virtual perimeter.

Clear Channel and its business partners may use this information to understand audience behavior, and business partners may send targeted messages to consenting devices about nearby advertising content when those devices are within the perimeter of its billboards. Users can revoke their consent to share geolocation data with beacons at any time by changing the settings on their phone. If you have not provided consent for your mobile devices to share data, the data will not be shared.

All data used by or shared with Clear Channel by its partners is aggregated and anonymous, and we do not retain any information about individuals, nor do we identify, track, profile or target any individual.

Computer vision software on our billboards

Computer vision software is commonly used in the outdoor advertising industry (e.g. billboards, streets, roads, highways, transportation, etc.). When vision software technology is used, including when used in a campaign by Clear Channel or its partners, a camera installed inside the screen is activated and can recognize the basic characteristics of people (e.g. it can detect movement in front of the screen, or height, your gender or hair color, etc.) who are looking at the screen in order to personalize the advertisements they see. For example, an interactive ad can show a pair of sunglasses worn by a woman or a man, depending on the gender of the person looking at the screen, or move according to the movement of the person in front. It may also capture interest in the advertisements we show (e.g., how long a person has been watching the advertisement, or what expressions that person has made).

If Clear Channel or its partners use computer vision technology, any personal data captured by it is captured and stored only temporarily. The software used is subject to rigorous de-identification, information security and near immediate memory deletion procedures. We use software suppliers that have undergone privacy impact assessments and have agreed to terms that state that they comply with applicable data protection legislation. Clear Channel does not attempt to identify you using computer vision software. We are not interested in profiling individuals. Instead, we and our data partners anonymise and aggregate all information into large-scale datasets to help us better understand audience demographics' responses to the ads we run on behalf of our advertisers.
